

1/. Given the attitude of "rugged individualism" which brought the original residents to Alaska, how is this going to be enforced?

2/. How are the public inebriates going to be dealt with?

3/. How much is this planning going to cost?

4/. In view of the concern about the seasonal migration of Canada Geese, how does this accord with the concepts of protection of wildlife?

5/. One wonders what is going to happen to this planning after the passage of years. Will succeeding generations maintain it? An example of revision of public property is the tax-funded Knowles' Coastal Trail. Recent building has destroyed the bucolic effect of the trail and one owner has actually removed trees on the marine side of the trail claiming that that portion of the trail was her property. I walked along the trail once by some recent buildings to be deafened by the pop music emitted by one of the residences (replete with its two SUVs parked outside).
