1	Please keep the baby homes, or something very similar. There are lots of other playgrounds for swinging/sliding/etc, and this park is so special because of the pretend play that it evokes. My 6 year old son is worried that he'll soon be too big to fit in the baby homes - so something a bit bigger could be good for kids his age. The kids also like being able to climb on top of the homes too. Having one or more sides of a home be covered in chalkboard material could be a great space for kids to draw. I wonder if that would discourage the annoying spray paint graffiti that shows up? We have some ideas for the grassy area below the baby homes too. It's a great sledding hill, so please don't put something directly below that would obstruct that. But we would love to see something down there to engage kids more than bare grass. How about a small obstacle course? Or a mini bike course, with small mounds/hills, a jump, a ramp, and a small bike sized teeter totter. Or simple low wood structures in the shape of a maze - with very low walls (12-24in?) that kids could also use as balance beams? Or a "petting garden" or some similar vegetation that would invite people down there.
2	A theme- a rocketship or train or something cool that allows kids to imagine or kickstart play. 0-5 year olds love, love, swinging (infant seat next to older seat is best so you can push two kids of different ages). Also sliding and climbing are key.
3	(Abstract Drawing)
4	I support keeping the play equipment on the Brookside street part of the park. Ping pong balls will end up in the creek. Barbara St. Side: keep it natural and quiet. Perhaps a bench looking at the creek.
5	Climbing (insert drawing of climber)
6	small, quaint- retain quiet happenstance vibe.
7	Something fun, safety, that sparks toddler imagination
8	Climbing or game in lower area
9	Would like a playground for all- whatever is appropriate for people with challenges and disabilities. Places for parents and kids to "see each other". Beautiful, cool modern materials with no graffiti!
